Development of Research and Science on the Topic of Social Politics

The social state is facing frequent, always changing challenges. These are based on changes in politics, judicature, changes in administration or simply adjustments in policies. This can be seen in the recent reforms of the old age pension sector. These “practical social policies” are based on solid, all encompassing, social studies. This with the involvement of the public. How though is this in tune with the actual research and development in a scientific way of social politics in Germany? The following articles are going to highlight the different views and avenues in research of social politics. One fact that will be closely highlighted is the existing problem of loss of scientific capabilities at German universities. The question will be raised if Germany wants to afford the loss of capabilities in scientific research in the field of social politics and policies. This will be viewed in regard of the fact that Germany uses one third of its GDP for the social sector.
